ADMISSION FREE

CHAS. WIRKKALA, Prop.

Questioned whether he did not believe the commission would seek for more power over railroads he said:

"I should judge from the hearing at New York, or rather, inquisition—that it is the purpose to impose further restrictions on the railroads of some kind or another. Apparently no attempt was made at New York to bring out anything except what might be used as a basis for asking increased power on the part of the Inter State Commission.

"But these things will come out all right. Everything the commission gave a twist to will straighten itself out in the swing.

The people will come to understand the situation. There was nothing done that has not benefitted the people. I am not considering Wall Street when I say this. I am merely considering the general public that uses the various lines and the figures show that what I say is true. Everything that was touched on at the New York inquisition showed this.

"A prejudiced public sentiment has been created for political purposes. It is created by one party as well as another. There is a lot of buncombe in this whole business. One party will appeal for an act to increase public control and stop the development of railroads. The other side will then appeal for an act to take over the railroads under government ownership."
